Lord Curzon's government at the height of the famine of 1900 fed 6,200,000 persons daily. The policy employed was to give work and wages to the able-bodied and free support to the sick and enfeebled and to children and old people. There is not in all history the record of a charity so vast as that administered by the government of India in 1900. The relief scene in the picture is creditable in the highest degree to the statesmanship that grappled so promptly and so vigorously with a calamity almost unequalled in India's awful history of disasters. The world has made charitable gifts for India famine relief at one time and another amounting to $20,000,000.
