Global and local designs

The first imported porcelain plates, bowls and cups were often decorated with Chinese images, such as the examples below.

When Europeans learnt how to make porcelain for themselves, it was popular to imitate Chinese images, in a style that became known as Chinoiserie (pronounced sheen-whaz-a-ree). There are several examples of this style as well as plates featuring more local pictures that were made in Swansea.

The porcelain trade: from China to Swansea

Porcelain or 'China' was exported to Europe in large quantities from China around the start of the seventeenth century. The pots were very popular for their high quality and blue and white designs. Eventually potters in Europe discovered how to make porcelain in the Chinese style, but demand for the Chinese originals remained high into the eighteenth century and beyond, when Swansea became a major producer.
